We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually) and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?

In a beautiful essay titled “Skin
in the Game,” Ruha Benjamin
writes, “In a society that
systematically privatizes
the very core of its being,
we eat to the person we love.

We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually)
and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?

In a beautiful essay titled “Skin
in the Game,” Ruha Benjamin
writes, “In a society that
systematically privatizes
the very core of its being,
we eat to the person we love.

We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us
to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually)
and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?

In a beautiful essay titled “Skin
in the Game,” Ruha Benjamin
writes, “In a society that
systematically privatizes
the very core of its being,
we eat to the person we love.

We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us
to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually)
and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?

In a beautiful essay titled “Skin
in the Game,” Ruha Benjamin
writes, “In a society that
systematically privatizes
the very core of its being,
we eat to the person we love.

We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us
to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually)
and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?

In a beautiful essay titled “Skin
in the Game,” Ruha Benjamin
writes, “In a society that
systematically privatizes
the very core of its being,
we eat to the person we love.

We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us
to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually)
and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?

In a beautiful essay titled “Skin
in the Game,” Ruha Benjamin
writes, “In a society that
systematically privatizes
the very core of its being,
we eat to the person we love.

We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us
to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually)
and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?

In a beautiful essay titled “Skin
in the Game,” Ruha Benjamin
writes, “In a society that
systematically privatizes
the very core of its being,
we eat to the person we love.

We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us
to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually)
and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?

In a beautiful essay titled “Skin
in the Game,” Ruha Benjamin
writes, “In a society that
systematically privatizes
the very core of its being,
we eat to the person we love.

We are out of control.

Garima Thakur & Shakespeare

How can we make room for messy conversations with each other that asks us
to acknowledge how we have let each other down (historically, collectively and individually)
and listen to the other about what we need to do to support one another?

What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life? What has the ongoing pandemic (2020-present) taught us about power and life?