

The Farrower's Bear

Though to be a product of enhancement magic gone wrong, these beasts have only existed on the continent for a few centuries. The namesake, Ser Darion Farrower, was the first to document the details of these fearsome creatures, in the first of the years following the wake of the opus. From a distance, the creatures appear to resemble bears. However, they far exceeds their counterparts in terms of size, strength, speed, deadliness and all other measures of being.

Farrower's bears are known to barrel through thick forest and brick and mortar houses alike in pursuit of food without so much as losing pace. Most magic seems to have no effect on them, and time and time again, they have overpowered even the strongest of warriors with ease.

The bear's temperament is highly volatile, and it displays signs of high defensiveness and aggression towards any who dare to set foot on its territory. Moreover, they are also one of the only creatures on the continent to be known to hunt for sport. Uneaten carcasses adorn the forest floor around their lairs close to the Westwoods. Currently, there is no known way to overcome the bear does one happen to stumble across one on their journey through the woods. Eyewitness accounts of the bear too are rare, as the bears do not leave witnesses. Accounts from travelers who claim to have seen these creatures and lived to tell the tale too are unreliable, and mostly turn out to be accounts of regular bears or falsehoods made up to swindle common townsfolk. This is one of the biggest reasons why not much is known about their appearance beyond their great size and strength.

Property of His Majesty's late Royal Scribe Maester Chromalen

